Introduction: Setting the Stage: Europe Before and After 1871

Before 1871, Europe was a patchwork of kingdoms, empires, and smaller states, many with overlapping claims and unresolved territorial disputes. The Congress of Vienna (1815) had attempted to create a stable balance of power, but simmering nationalisms and rivalries constantly threatened to erupt. The rise of Prussia, a relatively small but militarily powerful state, challenged the existing order. France, under Napoleon III, remained a major power, but its ambitions often clashed with those of its neighbours. The year 1871 marked a profound shift. The Franco-Prussian War resulted in the creation of a unified German Empire and a significantly weakened France, dramatically altering the European power balance. The chapter also explores the lasting resentment towards Germany, setting the stage for future conflicts.

Chapter 4: Other European Powers: Shifting Alliances and Rivalries

The 1871 map doesn't solely focus on France and Germany; it reflects the positions of other European powers, each grappling with the new geopolitical landscape. This chapter examines the responses of Great Britain, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Italy to the creation of the German Empire. It explores how the war reshaped existing alliances, created new rivalries, and influenced the formation of new power blocs.
