Her teaching style was far from the rote memorization we often associate with traditional education. She fostered critical thinking through lively discussions, encouraged creative interpretation, and ignited a passion for literature that has burned brightly ever since. She didn't simply deliver facts; she painted vivid pictures with words, weaving tales and characters into the very fabric of the classroom. Her enthusiasm was infectious, transforming what could have been a dry recitation of historical events or literary analysis into a compelling narrative that resonated deeply.
