Introduction: The World of Aerthos – Before and After the Shattering

Aerthos Before the Shattering: A World of Silver

Before the cataclysmic event known as the Great Shattering, Aerthos was a land of breathtaking beauty. Silver, far from being a threat, was a ubiquitous and revered element. Majestic cities were constructed from gleaming silver, its malleability and reflective properties inspiring breathtaking architecture. Silver rivers snaked through lush valleys, their shimmering surfaces reflecting the vibrant skies. Silver was interwoven into the very fabric of their culture, used in art, tools, and even religious ceremonies. It was a symbol of prosperity, peace, and the enduring strength of their civilization. Detailed records and archaeological findings, preserved in fragments across the fractured lands, paint a picture of a technologically advanced society, using silver not just for aesthetics but also in innovative applications we only dream of today. Think of intricate silver-powered mechanisms, advanced communication systems using silver-based conductors, and even sophisticated agricultural techniques that harnessed the unique properties of silver.

The Great Shattering: A World Transformed

The Great Shattering was not a single event, but rather a series of catastrophic occurrences. The precise cause remains a mystery, shrouded in legend and fragmented historical accounts. Some suggest a celestial event, a cosmic collision that unleashed untold energy, transforming the very nature of silver. Others point towards a technological disaster, a reckless experiment gone horribly wrong. Regardless of its origins, the effects were devastating. The silver, once malleable and benign, underwent a radical transformation, becoming unstable and highly volatile. It developed the capacity to generate intense heat and explosive energy, unleashing devastating Silverstorms – torrential downpours of burning silver ash that incinerated entire cities and scarred the landscape.

The resulting world is drastically different. Vast swathes of Aerthos are now desolate wastelands, choked with ash and scarred by the passage of Silverstorms. Civilization clings to survival, scattered in isolated settlements, constantly threatened by the unpredictable nature of the volatile silver. The once-revered metal is now a source of both fear and desperate need, holding the potential for both destruction and—potentially—salvation. The remaining fragments of pre-Shattering technology offer tantalizing glimpses into a lost era of abundance, while also presenting potential dangers if mishandled.
