Adam is a popular optimization algorithm used in deep learning. It is a variant of the stochastic gradient descent (SGD) algorithm, which is used to minimize the loss function. Adam combines the advantages of both SGD and the adaptive learning rate (AdaGrad) algorithm. It uses a moving average of the gradients to estimate the direction of the minimum. Adam also uses a moving average of the squared gradients to estimate the magnitude of the gradients. This allows Adam to adapt the learning rate for each parameter, which helps to converge faster and avoid local minima. Adam is widely used in deep learning applications, such as image classification, natural language processing, and speech recognition. It is a good choice for most applications, but it can be sensitive to hyperparameters. It is important to tune the learning rate and the beta parameters to get the best results.
