The Seeds of Conflict: From the Late Ottoman Era to the British Mandate

This chapter delves into the historical context that laid the groundwork for the conflict. It explores the socio-political dynamics of Palestine under Ottoman rule, highlighting the gradual influx of Jewish immigrants and the growing tensions between the burgeoning Jewish community and the existing Arab population. The Balfour Declaration of 1917, promising a "national home for the Jewish people" in Palestine, is critically examined, along with its ambiguous phrasing and the implications for the Arab population. The British Mandate period (1920-1948) is analyzed, showcasing the escalating violence between Jews and Arabs, the failures of British administration, and the growing polarization of the two communities. Dowty's analysis of this period, emphasizing the role of British policy in exacerbating existing tensions, provides a crucial lens through which to understand the conflict's origins. We'll explore the economic, social and political factors that contributed to the unrest and set the stage for the events of 1948.
